Message to Students

Dear students,

our country is once again on a severe lockdown.

Situations out of our reach compel us to remote lectures, but, as sad as it is, current measures are absolutely necessary to defend public health and safety.

We know all too well how this situation impairs the communal life out of which public education thrives, as we do believe in active participation to classes and in the value of lectures in attendance.

We shall return to classrooms in presence as soon as it will again be possible and we are planning the next year as a year of learning in presence.

From the very beginning we have planned our courses committing ourselves to methods of learning which requires presence and debate between professors and students and we shall make any effort to stick to our plans and values.

We must all, now, respond to current challenges and make full use of the potential offered by e-learning platforms.

It is our duty, as a community of knowledge, to bring on our work even in the most exceptional of circumstances. And so we shall do.

I really wish to thank you all, and all my colleagues, for the effective and ongoing commitment to the values of public education, as I am pretty sure and confident that these values will prevail.
